State Registries Guide

States use various ways to track donor registrations. To help people who might want to explore additional tracking methods for their state, we have listed below the primary tracking methods and the states that use them so you can contact each other for information and assistance.

Paper Registrations

In previous donor designation campaigns, paper registrations have proven to be a very successful method for tracking new enrollments. At campaign events, volunteers ask potential donors to register using official state registration forms coded with the name of the hospital at the top. These forms can be counted and tallied on a weekly basis and entered into the registry.

The following states plus the District of Columbia have paper registration capability:

Alaska www.alaskadonorregistry.org	Kentucky www.donatelifeky.org	Oklahoma www.lifeshareregistry.org
Alabama www.alabamalifelegacy.org	Louisiana www.lopa.org	Oregon www.donatelifenw.org

Registration Custom Pages — “Side Doors”

When a registration link is sent to a potential donor and they click on it to get to their state’s registry, this is called a “side door.” It is a special entry portal to a donor registry Web site that includes the ability to track what prompted the visitor to register. For example, if people click on a link within WPFL hospital campaign materials, they would enter their state registry through a side door that would count them as a visitor from the WPFL hospital campaign.

The following states have side door capability:

Mobile Laptop Registration

Another method of registering new donors is setting up Internet-connected laptops at registration events and inviting potential donors to register online. This method enables tracking by tallying the number of people who sign up. Although this method is very useful for tracking, anecdotal evidence indicates that some people are reluctant to sign up online in public settings due to security issues and the time necessary to access and complete their registry requirements.

Registration Web Site Pull-Down Menus

Some state registries have the ability to ask visitors how they learned about the registry. Often this involves a pull-down menu listing possible answers (friend/family member, hospital, event, etc). The registrant can select the answer that applies to them. However, selecting an item from the pull-down menu is usually voluntary, so this method will not account for registrants who choose not to specify how they learned about the registry or what hospital triggered their decision.
